SUBJECT: MEDIA REACTION SUSPECTED US TROOPS' KILLING OF IRAQI CIVILIANS - TOKYO

LEAD STORIES: Most Wednesday morning papers front-paged reports concerning a set of recommendations on telecommunications and broadcasting reform compiled Tuesday by an advisory panel to Minister of Internal Affairs and Communications Takenaka, including a complete breakup of NTT and a reduction in the number of NHK's radio and satellite TV stations.

1. "Incomplete Investigation Cannot Build Confidence in the US" An editorial in the liberal Mainichi commented (6/7): "...In the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib scandal, there are suspicions that US troops have killed innocent Iraqi civilians in a number of cities. Although US military authorities have determined that there were no problems with some of the killings, the suspicions continue to deepen. At this point, we hope for a serious investigation on the part of US military authorities. Now that a permanent Iraqi government has been formed, attention is turning to the withdrawal of foreign troops, including Japan's GSDF unit. Earning the antipathy of Iraqis will make it more difficult to improve the security situation and to create the conditions that would allow the pullout of foreign troops. This is not an issue for the US alone....

2. "It is said that more than 30,000 Iraqi civilians have already died in the war. If the US military wishes to view itself as a liberation force that freed Iraqis from a dictatorship, it should take the greatest possible care to prevent civilians from being caught in the crossfire and should strictly bring to account those responsible for killing or wounding civilians, whether accidentally or deliberately. Some within the US have linked the suspected killings with the My Lai massacre during the Vietnam War.... We wonder whether the madness of war that reared its head 40 years ago is sneaking up on US troops in Iraq. This is a point that the US must examine in the most careful and humble way possible."
